If someone with a cracked license can. The present invention generally relates to the field of magnetic resonance (MR) imaging, and more particularly to a method for defining an MR image region of interest (ROI) to be used in an image processing sequence. Magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) is a non-destructive method for the analysis of materials and is widely used in medicine to diagnose internal injuries and abnormalities. Since the technical development of the MRI system in the early 1980s, there has been an ever-increasing demand for higher performances of the MR system, such as imaging speed and quality. The essence of MRI is based on the fact that the nuclei of atoms have a magnetic dipole moment which is made to rotate in a strong magnetic field by using a radio frequency (RF) pulse. If the MRI system has multiple receivers, it is possible for multiple images of different objects to be acquired at the same time. However, all these images are generated from a single MR acquisition process that may span over a few minutes. In other words, different portions of an object may be imaged by a single MR acquisition at different times. Thus, a number of important problems arise: a lack of sufficient spatial and temporal localization, and significant motion blurring in the MR images (due to the dephasing of the spins).

One method for compensating for such motion is to use multiple image data sets, each one acquired at
