Serum levels of C1 esterase inhibitor (C1 INH), an inhibitor of the complement system, were measured in 16 patients with acute viral hepatitis and were compared with the C1 INH levels in normal subjects and patients with acute bacterial infection. Serum C1 INH levels were low in all 16 patients with acute viral hepatitis. C1 INH was increased in nine patients (56%). The levels were higher than normal in three patients, and significantly so in five (59%). Serum C1 INH levels were below normal in patients with viral hepatitis A, B, and E, but were elevated in patients with other forms of viral hepatitis. When C1 INH levels were measured serially in four patients with hepatitis A, significant increases in

C1 INH levels followed spontaneous recovery. The elevations in C1 INH levels were not due to haemolysis as judged by complete normalization of red blood cell levels with an extended course of therapy. Serum C1 INH levels were low in two of the three patients who died. These results suggest that C1 INH levels are elevated in the early phases of acute viral hepatitis,
