Sorted alphabetically and by plant type. The map uses vector data from the United States Geological Survey's National Land Cover Data (NLCD) 2001 data set. There are different needs that individuals must meet in urban environments. It is essential to meet these needs because urban dwellers need to get health, education, housing, entertainment, transportation, food, water, and sanitation. Since there are so many needs to be met within urban environments, a collaborative effort is necessary between the government, private groups, and non-government organizations to meet these needs. To be able to live in an urban area, you should first find out what the population of the urban area is, what the resources are in the area, and what the city services are within the area. There are several factors that should be considered when planning to urban areas because it can help meet needs for individuals who live in the city. The Urban Development Institute (UDI) is a non-profit organization that is responsible for funding programs that help cities develop. UDI will base their funding on the number of job opportunities that they will provide for city residents. The Urban Development Institute is able to make their funding available because they use a grant that is funded by the United States Department of Housing and Urban Development. The U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development provides UDI a grant so that the organization will spend the money wisely and properly. Regions in the United States that have the most partnerships include the Northeast, the Midwest, the West Coast, and the South. What each region has in common is that there is a great diversity within the partnerships. One of the most common types of partnerships for cities is the public-private partnership (PPP). PPP's are partnerships that are set up to help the government build and maintain projects. These projects can include hospitals, schools, hotels, and roads. The government will provide funds to the PPP so that they can be used for the project. These partnerships can help the community because the funding will be evenly divided among the partners. Another popular partnership that is often seen in the United States are the corporation and the government partnerships. This partnership is beneficial because the corporation offers to help cities develop and the government agrees to accept the help. For example, the corporation may decide to build a factory or even buy a piece of land for a project. The government will agree to provide the corporation with the money to do the project because it will be able to generate tax money from the project. 3da54e8ca3
