In the summer of 2016, I was in a pit of despair. I was diagnosed with breast cancer shortly after getting married, so a decade-long relationship with birth control and trying to avoid pregnancy had begun, and I had stopped the bleeding. My doctor told me to wait for any residual effects of the chemo to clear up, and that I should take it easy for the next couple of months. My husband and I were leaving our family home in Chicago, moving back to Seattle to start a new life with our two young children. It was as stressful a time as you can imagine, and I was in no condition to be nervous about a new life with two little kids. We were pretty close, so it was also very hard for me to be sad or scared. It was around this time that I looked up my family history and realized that, although I was fine, I was a first-generation breast cancer survivor. By the time I was diagnosed, it was already the two-year mark since my father had died of prostate cancer. My mom and her sister were the only people who knew that I had a genetic mutation that meant I was at high risk for developing breast cancer. With so many people in my family dying at a young age, I don't think any of them realized it was that likely. I'm a yoga teacher, and I do extensive research on any health and wellness topic. I was reading through online archives, and I saw a case study of a family whose story was similar to mine. It was heartbreaking to read about how devastating it was for them.
