Nutritional Support in the Intensive Care Unit: What is the Evidence? Protein metabolism is altered in critically ill patients due to their hypermetabolic responses to stress, negative nitrogen balance, and increased protein turnover. To review the literature on nutritional support of these patients. Protein metabolism affects multiple organ systems and is affected by nutrition. Intensive care units (ICU) patients are at risk of protein malnutrition, and adequate nutritional support is required to promote restoration of nitrogen balance and maintain normal physiologic functions. Nutritional support of the critically ill patient can be directed by 1) the level of catabolism, 2) the clinical picture, and 3) the quality and quantity of calories and protein provided. Enteral feeding should be considered in patients unable to tolerate enteral feeding due to increased levels of stress hormones (e.g., glucocorticoids) or cardiopulmonary dysfunction. Gastric residuals, volume of gastric aspirate, and feeding intolerance can help to select caloric delivery rates. Despite the accumulation of data regarding protein nutrition and metabolic changes in critically ill patients, the literature is still filled with issues regarding which target amino acid nitrogen level and target protein energy ratio is appropriate for individual patients. Andrew Bynum emerged from the Philadelphia 76ers' locker room Wednesday morning in street clothes, seemingly not well. Despite Bynum's absence, the club appeared to be in good spirits, including Michael Carter-Williams, the No. 2 overall pick in the 2013 NBA draft who just finished his first training camp with the team. When asked about team chemistry, Carter-Williams, who worked out at the Sixers' practice facility this summer, said: "I think it's coming together. "I think we're all close
