* 1x sample project included with Animations Select - Water * All 20 set of animation sheets for your dragon to frolic in, wave at, or explore the deep. * Terrain mesh and texture * All animations made using in-game methods * All animations are well-optimized for speed, allowing them to run at a solid 60 frames per second for optimal performance in games with that frame-rate requirement. * All skill animations are based on using the "Current Variable" of the skills for a powerful expression of the animation * All skill animations have been carefully crafted to be in-sync with the pattern on the skill graphs of the supported skills. * All skill animations have been carefully crafted to be in-sync with the pattern on the skill graphs of the supported skills. * Every animation clip is crafted to be highly customisable and fully playable in almost any style you prefer. * All animation clip examples have been carefully crafted to be playable at least in the following style settings: * Mac Only * Windows Only * Standard * Dark * Blade * Eclipse * Doom * Beach/Sunset * Impact * Fire * Explosion * Looking Down * Looking Up * Starfield * Tube For more, please contact: Animation Pack Features: - Water: 10 different WAV files. I made sure to choose a variety of different sounds for this pack, the tones and styles will also differ more than in most packs. - Skins: Even more than with our other packs, I'm really picky about how the actual animation skin looks. Each animation is given its own skin, so that no two animations can have the same appearance. The body-skin of each animation is also unique. I really want to thank everyone for taking the time to read this, and I hope you enjoy using Animations Select - Water as much as I enjoyed making it! Americans have been warned to expect a banner year for summer vacations. It's the time of year when children and college students cram into local hotels and motel rooms across the country, start their summer road trips in June and return home to be reunited with their families, but it's also a time when more people are paying for their vacations — and that will mean big savings.

published:10 Nov 2017 views:142443 Playlist link: This weekend I got myself a proper BeagleBoneBlack (because the first one I had never worked) but I quickly found out that it didn't like using all my mini display port (hdmi) outputs, if I cranked the brightness way up I could see the image, if I pulled it down to be comfortable, then turned the brightness up it would actually cause the image to sometimes disappear. After doing a little research I found a person that did some serious tinkering in their opinion some times it is not how bright the screen is, but how the brightness of the image is scaled. Well unfortunately they didn't publish their methods, so I had to explore some other options, which is what lead me to messing around with the brightness setting on different OSes and different distros. The ones I tried were: Ubuntu 16.10, Xubuntu 16.10, Budgie 16.04 and plain vanilla Debian 7.5. I figured out that the actual hardware brightness settings are: 00 to 01 : 100% 10 to 11 : 150% Anything above 11 and there is no image at 100% If I went to 150% the image would be crystal clear but everything on the screen would be at max brightness. I first ran into issues on Budgie because I initially tried to use a script supplied by a friend, which could be found here: Simply put the script monitors the brightness of the backlight and in conjunction with the brightness setting in the GUI will increase or decrease the screen brightness. The way the script works is by inserting and executing the following command in /etc/rc.local: xset led 1/2/3 255 This sets the correct backlight level based on the brightness setting in the GUI. The script supplied by the free desktop developers of Budgie is here (it can be found at /etc/xdg/autostart/

Pack Chapter 1 - The End of the War Captain Caldwell gave the P-63 a little throttle and pulled the fighter out of the long glide. In seconds he had his eyes glued to the instrument panel, the transmission was spitting air through the exhaust and the engine made the thump-thump-thump sound of the old P-40s. He looked around and the Russian-built Mi-8MTV2, and the PB-1 Firefly up ahead - he had a clear visual on the military technical and a few other troops in the vicinity. He was in no danger but he still hoped to pull the Mi-8 out of its dive. "Sounds like the cannon is still shooting!" he said. Caldwell opened the throttle and the plane seemed to immediately get a bigger overhaul. "Yes, we were lucky to get two holes in it during the first engagement!" responded Erikson. "Get as close as you can to the Mi-8, we do not know what happens when it starts to fall." "Sure." Erikson jerked the throttles until the throttle levers were at full lever for maximum power. The Mi-8 slipped a few meters closer to the ground and he started to pull up. Caldwell held the P-63 as close to the hydrofoil as possible, he only gained thirty meters as it barely seemed to touch the water. His fingers were moist with sweat and his heart started beating a little bit faster. The Mi-8 dropped quickly and he wondered what to do. When Erikson realized the Mi-8 was going to hit the ground, he immediately pulled the nose up to the desired glide speed of ten or fifteen knots. With the Mi-8 slapping the ground as a gigantic heavy machine, the Dragon 6 burst back into the air, jumping as high as possible. A few seconds later the Mi-8 went under and dropped straight down. Caldwell saw the Hipper rapidly approaching the Mi-8 as the Mi-8 began to be sucked out to the middle of the dry lake bed - when it looked like the deck was collapsing under it, the Hipper reached for it and caught it. In any other situation, Caldwell would've been impressed by the Hipper's speed and flying ability. But as a brave little shot at the Eastern Front, it
