Importing Pictures into Photoshop When you import photos into Photoshop, you're essentially copying, or cloning, your images, which lets you work on their individual features. Many photo editing programs are based on the idea that if you clone and combine several original photos into one image, you end up with an image that was created by more than one person and, therefore, has more depth. Photoshop, on the other hand, isn't that kind of program, so if you're trying to emulate some other process, you probably won't get the results you expect. Before you import photos, take a look at the following tips to ensure the best results: * It's good practice to shoot in RAW mode, which simply means that the camera captures the image as a digital file without the distortion or other flaws caused by some commonly used camera settings. RAW files have the highest image quality and are perfect for editing, which is why most professionals use the software programs mentioned in the next section. If you shoot in RAW mode, you can always convert your image to a standard file and then import it into Photoshop. The conversion process isn't difficult or time-consuming, and you can always edit the file afterward if you have problems with it. *

You can usually import multiple images at once. If a program lets you import more than one photo at once, choose it. Otherwise, select the photos you want to work with. You can then go to File⇒File Handling⇒Open, which opens the photos for you and lets you choose which to work with. Choose the photos you want to work with in the dialog box that appears. From here, you can also import as many images as you want by using the + symbol to add additional photos. If you want to add more photos, just select the photos from the dialog box, and they'll appear in the main window. * Make sure that your images are small enough. A good rule

A Literal Fireball From Mercury as Scanned by NASA's MESSENGER: An artist's impression shows a close view of the surface of Mercury. The rover, or lander, is one of two instruments on the spacecraft. Scientists planning to use the data from the spacecraft will need to carefully analyse it for accurate scientific measurements. The miniature black box on the end of the drill is the touch-screen instrument from which the images will be displayed. The gift of a massive meteorite falls on the Mercury

Mercury is considered the closest planet to the sun and it is the innermost planet in the solar system. "About 8 billion years ago, the iron core of the planet Mercury was completely melted by the intense heat of planetary formation and the entire planet was vaporised," noted the scientists.

"Mercury expanded due to its rapid cooling, and a massive satellite formed around the planet. This satellite was on an orbit close to the size of Earth's orbit around the sun and the planet was then named for the Greek god who described it: Mercury. We think Earth's moon was formed in a similar way."

The impact of the fireball on the surface of Mercury weakened the orbits of the planet, causing it to gradually speed up and now it comes to perihelion nearly once every 88 days. This space rock is the first ancient meteorite to be seen in the Solar System.

"When the planet Mercury was created 8 billion years ago, it was molten rock, and the solidifying rock became the bulk of the present Mercury," explained. "The fireball that struck the surface of Mercury is the first solid fragment of planet's core that has ever been seen by anyone else. It will now go on to many more scientific discoveries and experiments." The ancient rock was collected after its descent to the surface of Mercury. Images are taken by MESSENGER to be studied later by scientists.
