Most batteries contain a negative electrode, a positive electrode, and an electrolyte. The negative electrode contains materials that are capable of accepting electrons in exchange for protons, while the positive electrode contains materials that are capable of donating electrons in exchange for protons. The electrolyte contains ionic species capable of migrating between the negative and positive electrodes during discharge of the battery. When a battery is first charged, the typical operation of a battery is oxidation of the anode to deposit electrons on the anode and the electrolyte to form a salt from the anode and the electrolyte. As electrons flow through the electrical circuit, a chemical reaction occurs at the negative electrode to consume the anode and produce a product. During discharge of the battery, the negative electrode is oxidized to release electrons and consume the anode and produce the product. In the prior art, the anode on a battery is generally not charged. Rechargeable batteries containing metal hydride alloys in either the anode or the cathode are known. Typically, the battery is discharged to below its metal hydride alloy hydrogen storage capacity, which results in a metal hydride alloy in a substantially metal-free, hydrogen-containing state. The battery is then charged to the storage capacity, and a rechargeable battery can be reused after multiple uses. Rechargeable batteries containing lithium an
