the relationship isn't really why the movie's about though. it's a love story and it's a romantic comedy with the usual misunderstandings and misunderstandings and misunderstandings. it's just that each of the two stars, black and paltrow, do the thing they do best. paltrow's character always has this goofy thing like she's seen so much stuff that all she does is sit there and drool. and he has to keep trying to get her to smile. so, it's a bit of a jumble to look at. but what's most important is that you should like the farrelly brothers and you should like paltrow. she's a good actress. not quite at the top, but she's funny and quirky and adorable. and you should love robbins because he's very, very funny and very sexy and because he's totally, totally right about everything. when you are looking at a romance film in which the real attraction is based on looks, you should not be getting a message from any of the characters. it's an extremely weak point of the film, and the major shortcomings are threefold: (1) a terrible screenplay, (2) action outside of the relationships which lacks energy, and (3) a poor ending. the fourth time around, the farrelly brothers made the bold and seemingly risky choice of casting will smith as a shallow, television-addicted, 50-year-old guy who, through hypnosis, falls in love with a 30-year-old woman who can only be described as smokin'. that they clearly knew they were getting the man, and would definitely follow through on the idea, is the first sign of hope. the fact that the relationship is based on looks, and not at all on any kind of chemistry is sadly typical of their recent material.

the movie is so good that you'll find yourself thinking something like this: "wow, the filmmakers are really trying to get across something important." it works, which is the biggest compliment one can pay to a movie. easy riders & raging bulls is the eagerly awaited new movie by peter farrelly and bobby farrelly, the comedic-minded brothers who used to be best friends with scorsese and dicaprio. that was more than three decades ago, when scorsese and dicaprio were struggling. but now that farrelly has moved up to the stars of the show, the critics are lining up to offer him their fealty. and so, what with that and this, one may be forgiven for thinking that he is experiencing the full big apple in the big easy. indeed, it would be a mistake. this is one puppy you'll probably like to leave at home. jack black as a self-involved iconoclast is a sight to be sure. my favorite moment comes when he goes to a self-help seminar and is mesmerized by the charismatic guru. all this is a very silly conceit. the movie just goes for it, and black milks it with relish and makes it entertaining. but, at its heart, this is a movie about the sweetness of two individuals who are deeply attracted to each other. one of them has a secret; the other is smart, charming, and, oddly, he is attracted to the other person's secret. both characters are attractive. it's a good movie. if you're going to watch it, you'd better be there. one of my favorites. it's about the idea that we are all hypnotized to see beauty in a certain way. i think part of it's because of people's weak sides as well as our strong sides. black is always there for robbins, it seems. black never gives up on robbins.
