Our new modern, open approach, the IBM Cloud Pak for Security platform, is built on RedHat Open Shift and supports today's hybrid multicloud environments with an extensive partner ecosystem. Cloud Pak for Security is an enterprise-ready containerized software solution that enables you to manage the security of your data and applications by quickly integrating your existing security tools to generate deeper insights into threats across hybrid cloud environments, leaving your data where it is and allowing easy orchestration and automation of your security response. The third workshop was held as a special session during the Resilience 2017 conference in Stockholm, Sweden in August 2017. By the time of the conference, first drafts of the papers had been circulated and peer reviewed by other contributing authors. The presentations at the conference were aimed at providing key insights from the case studies to group critical emerging themes. During the session, the contributing authors elucidated and further refined more specific cross-cutting themes that emerged from each of the studies. From this, we used thematic clustering and reflective editing of the special issue to generate additional insights on transformations across the case studies. These form the bulk of the analytical material presented in Unpacking different phases of transformative spaces. For more information on the methods used in the individual cases, please see the respective papers. We have argued that transformative spaces are not a container for challenging power relations. We have also underlined that they should be considered as spaces of practice as they generate insight into what happens in and through practice. As such, transformative spaces are a site where new theories and epistemologies can be addressed and where new forms of knowledge can emerge. This includes knowledge that is critical and reflexive but also collaborative and in dialogue with the public. In addition, transformative spaces have to generate what we call potentialities. These are potentials for action that might be activated in and through practice. Potentialities are the materiality of transformative spaces. In being located as potentialities in the midst of social relations, they allow us to think about transformations not as finally achieved but as always being situated in new historical and social contexts.
