Features like Live Edge and Pen Compensation are ones I thought were just "Photoshop for iPad and iPhone exclusives". Too bad I could not try it out myself to prove how light it felt and how easy it was to use. I hope to test it out in the near future. The PSD files format is by far the simplest file format to deal with. SMB describes Photoshop's situation on SkyDrive rather poorly: "The file format does not support saving per-layer information cleanly into TIFF files. Instead, it provides only two layers of control over the file format for changing the *directory/directory name." Most users tend to store their PSD files with relative ease because they just can't imagine saving every layer individually. The first release of Lightroom didn't do too well. Lightroom 4.3 was released in October of 2012, and Lightroom Pro was released in January of 2014. Lightroom 5 was released in November of 2014. Lightroom is a full-fledged image-manipulating program that can do some things the other Photoshop can't. Of course, it's also more capable in a few other ways, too, such as its ability to use the entire monitor as its canvas. Lightroom 5 is a huge update to a program that is starting to take off. It's no surprise that the company has grown even larger throughout the years. They've had four different CEOs in that time. Now, the CEO is trying to refocus on the core software that's a part of their in-house suite of applications. I am interested in how all of this plays out for the users.

Once you've pasted it, you can edit the layer's color and position and it'll be just like the original image. More likely than not though, you'll want to create a new layer out of it. To edit the color create a new solid color layer, place its layer's background at 0% opacity, and paint the color you want. Make the original copy the active layer, then use the Move tool to move the layer down and to the left. This will move the layer closer to the original layer and just above it. Now with the original copy selected and moved down and to left, press the "Edit" menu button and select the "layer mask" option. This will create a Layer Mask out of the Layer copied from the image. When you move it and make it a little smaller it'll hide the original layer and keep only the layer mask. You can easily use this Layer Masks in this manner to create shadows/highlights. Just understand that the image you put on the Shadow/Highlight control layer should be at 50% opacity so the Layer Mask can be easily moved. Every programmer loves to play with the new.
