Expression of human hsp90 β in the yeast Saccharomyces cerevisiae: characterization of a constitutively active and temperature-sensitive mutant of hsp90 β . The yeast Saccharomyces cerevisiae has been developed as a heterologous protein production system. Recently, we have reported the expression of human hsp90 β in the yeast S. cerevisiae, and we have obtained a human hsp90 β gene expressing yeast cell strain. However, we were not able to select a cell strain that constitutively expresses the protein, and the yeast cells became resistant to high temperature stress. To obtain a yeast cell strain that constitutively expresses the protein, we have applied a novel method, the "external complementation assay" for selecting protein-producing cells in a heterologous protein expression system. This method is a simple and rapid procedure that can be used as an alternative method to traditional methods. By applying the method, we succeeded in obtaining a constitutively expressing strain of hsp90 β , although its protein expression level is lower than that of a human hsp90 β -expressing strain. Moreover, we obtained a yeast cell strain expressing a temperature-sensitive mutant of human hsp90 β that complements the temperature sensitivity of a yeast hsp90 mutant. This yeast cell strain was very useful for the overexpression of human hsp90 β and for its study. You don't have to log in to access user-submitted product reviews of other Ebook Reader users.
