Most of the most interesting new features include: higher-res displays and display modes to take advantage of the extra pixels, a new feature called "magnify," and the ability to tag photos with keywords and actions. They also plan to make Lightroom integrate better with other Adobe products. If you are considering embarking on the product upgrade journey, it would be helpful if you go to the Lightroom website Know What's New and What's Coming and familiarize yourself with the new features that will be discovered. The majority of us here at MacLife are voracious readers, and we do a great deal of that on our laptops, even though a true all-in-one-laptop is one of the most oft-mentioned accessories from the Apple line. It's partly nostalgia, of course, and partly due to the fact that, while we love to roam about on the road, we often need to be able to do our work from locations that don't necessarily have the requisite performance from our laptops, or even the wifi. Enter the Chromebook. I don't know about you, but when I was a kid, I wanted a laptop that had a real keyboard, and a good screen. I didn't get that. But I did get a laptop with Firefox, iTunes, and a ton of other programs that seemed like they would be in another planet if I'd just booted them from a CD. At least, that's what it seems like. In reality, if you've got a Chromebook, you've got access to more of the things you need than you would if you'd gone, say, with Ubuntu or Windows.

Adobe Photoshop CC: Version 201019, should be applicable to Windows & Mac OS only. It was the first version of the Photoshop series to available on both Mac & PC (Mac was earlier). Finally, to illustrate the new look for the Photoshop and Acrobat brand, Adobe has released the magazine cover for the November 2020 issue of Photoshop Magazine. New Photoshop features are always a highlight, but this one is really special as it features the newly rebuilt software and a special pullout advertisement for the brand's future projects. It is interesting to see how the 3D assets of Photoshop CE are slowly being replaced with the native GPU-accelerated drawing tools of Photoshop proper as the product transitions to native features for using 2D and 3D workflows. This explains why this version of Photoshop REQUIRES that the Feature GPU option be enabled in your preferences, as you can see in the attached screencap. This is super cool, as no longer are you limited to the top three layers of the UI by using stitching layers. The new multi-threading and GPU features now allow you to come up with and achieve almost anything that you could in Illustrator, and in tandem, in future add-ons and feature updates from the new Inskcape module. This is really a fine-grained, well-thought-out transition, and not by coincidence, comes with the news of Outerra's transition to dedicated in-house 3D folks in a new role to ensure that both tools remain as compatible as possible. What's more, Outerra were able to confirm that the new UI in Photoshop will not hamper the performance of the most popular filter type of all (and more about this later...).
